apparatus, which can be easily carried about, will give a light fit for deak use for fifteen hours. For lighting houses the batteries can be charged economically only from a dynamo run by a steam, gas, or bot-air engine. As the production of an electric current is sixteen times more coally from zinc and chemicals than from coal, the use of storage letteries for house-lighting depends largely upon an economical supply of power. For very small lights, however, needing but little current, the charging of the secondary battery can be effected from Gitteries or Bunsen primary cells.
